How to Build a Survival Fire in Bad Weather

Categories: Creating Fire, Self-Sufficiency, Wilderness Survival

The ability to start a fire when things are less than perfect. Considering how important the warmth from a fire can be when the temperatures drop, we should prepare spark a flame. Your chances of success will come with practice and perseverance. Attempt fire starting right after rainfall, or snow. Mimic possible environments you could possibly confront during a camping trip or bugging out or even if you find your self in a natural disaster.

If you are wet you could get hypothermia and die, with a fire you will keep warm, and hopefully dry off so take in the skills from this article and keep it for a later date, but best of all try your skills out for real.

Picture Credit: fieldandstream.com

How to Build a Survival Fire in Bad Weather