If there ever is a grid-down, total-collapse of society, how well will you fare? These days preppers largely focus on what they can purchase, store and carry, with many preppers planning to run away to a secret bug-out-location to survive in isolation...

In many ways modern day preppers are the polar opposite of native Americans - the native Americans gather in communities, live off the land, carry little with them, and they have the ability to travel undetected. I think maybe we should all focus a little more on community, knowledge and skills, rather than just trying to purchase goods and equipment to see us through.
